The company whose entire raison d'être ensures the reliability of the companies' websites and Internet-connected services had some online problems even Friday. In a statement late in the afternoon, the company confirmed that at least some of its customers had a bad day. We are aware that some regions may have problems with some Cloudflare services, the company announced. We're investigating now. We contacted Cloudflare in an attempt to find out what had specifically gone wrong and how many customers were affected. We received no immediate response. However, a business status page provided important insights. This afternoon we saw a power outage over parts of our network, the statement reads. It was not as a result of an attack. It seems that a router on our global backbone announced bad routes and caused some parts of the network not to be available. The company added that they believed the root cause of the outage had been addressed. We are aware that some regions may have problems with some Cloudflare services. We're investigating now. — Cloudflare Help (@CloudflareHelp) July 17, 2020 At the time of writing, Downtidetector (which is owned by Mashable's parent company J2) showed Cloudflares problems concentrated in the US and northern Europe. Au. Picture: screenshot / dwwndetector While Cloudflare struggled to get its services fully functioning again, the internet delighted in the sight of a company selling DDoS protection not being able to stay online - and the equivalent of much of the internet is struggling as a result. Services like Discord there among these reporting issues – probably as a result of Cloudflare's power outage. connect *** not linkorry for typos we trynna fix and tweet at the same time, not simple things - Discord (@discord) July 17, 2020 This is not the first time Cloudflare has run into trouble. In 2017, the company reported observing network performance issues. UPDATE: July 17, 2020, 3:19 p.m. .m PDT: This story has been updated to include a statement from Cloudflare denying that Friday's problems were the result of an attack. Loading Cloudflare Apps...
